Climbing Ethics

Responsible climbing will protect cliffs and ensure continued rock climbing in Maple Canyon

- Use colored chalk that blends with the rocks.
- Leave dull colored webbing when recovery is impossible.
- Use bolt hangers that are dull or painted dull colors.
- Before bolting in a new route, ask yourself if its uniqueness and quality justifies the impact.
- Avoid indiscriminate or excessive use of fixed equipment.
- Help protect native plants by not using wire brushes to clean rocks.
- Do not tramp vegetation.
- Do not disturb nesting birds.
- Use slings for rappelling anchor points. Pulling ropes around trees can permanently damage them.
- Show courtesy to other groups who might not share your enthusiasm for climbing.

How Did It Get Here?

Maple Canyon is made up of a sedimentary rock called conglomerate. Conglomerate is formed when rocks and pieces of rocks are transported by water and gravity, to a basin or depression where the lower layers are compacted and cemented by lime carbonate or iron oxides. Here erosion has stripped away the upper layers, giving us the exposed cemented conglomerate of Maple Canyon.

As you hike the trails enjoying the natural beauty of Maple Canyon, notice the cobble-sized stones that make up the conglomerate. They are as smooth as rocks in a streambed, and you might imagine them being polished by moving water and being cemented in an ancient lake bed.

Do your part to protect this unique and beautiful area.
